AUTOMATIC RIFLE MARKING

Notwithstanding all the inconnity that has been exercised, and all the precautions that have been taken against accidents to those whose duty it is to mark the results at rifle contests, it does happen occasionally that unlucky shots are made. and that the marker falls a victim to some irregularity of his own or of the marksman. An inention has just been brought before the public which seems likely in future to disponse with he marker altogether. The idea is somewhat milar to those of the small signals in the boxes of the railway switchmen, which being electrically connected with distant signal posts not simultaneously with them, and thus show at a glance their position. In a similar manner the distant targety are connected with smaller representations at the firing point. The latter are marked off into four sections by two lines crossing at right angles in the centre of a number of concentric rings. Every ring has a small hale in it in each of the four sections, and when a bullet strikes any point of the distant target a number appears in the hole pierced in the corresponding disc at the firing point. It does. of course, sometimes happen that a shot is lodged on the line which separates two rings in a target, or rather, at the line where two rings are in contiguity. The inventor has provided for this contingency by arranging that a shot thus falling between the two shall call un a number in both the rings on the dial at home. Thus the dangerous duty of marking will probably henceforth be done by the bullet itself. The un fortunate thing is that these intricate mechanical appliances, however, perfect in theory, are ant to break down in practice most lamentably. If we mistake not, there have been many previous attompts of a more or less ingenious sort to solve the problem of automatic marking at rifle ranges. But when it came to test the inventions by rapid firing, the mechanism got out of gear, and human instrumentality had to be again resorted to. We hope better things of the new scheme, but until it has undergone a practical experiment on an erhaustive scale, judgment should be suspended as to its intrinsic merits. - Globe:
